

WAR GRAVES

What can war cemetery headstone inscriptions tell us about families' attitudes to the loss of their loved ones?

There are over 30 000 Australian soldiers' graves in France and Belgium.

Most Australian headstones contain the name, age and date of death of the soldier. At the end of the war the families of those whose loved one had a known grave were invited to create a statement or epitaph to be engraved on the headstone. These epitaphs can tell us much about how the families felt about the loss of their family member. Were they angry? Did they think the loss was justified, or futile? What did they see as the main reason why their loved one died?

Look at this sample of inscriptions from Australian headstones on the Western front. See if you can find these ideas or values or attitudes in the inscriptions.
